Hume questions

A. 1&2 Is it always right to eliminate prejudice? Are there situations when prejudice is desirable?

B. 3&4 Hume appeals to a kind of consensus on what counts as beautiful - is that still feasible in our fragmented world of content? How about cross cultural views?

C. 5&6 Is Homer, or are other classical writers, praised b/c good or b/c in cannon - in your school textbooks, etc.? Does that take away their beauty, if any?

D. 1&2 How much comparison or practice is enough to be a critic and how would we know?

E. 3&4 Can you argue with someone to see beauty as you do and therefore have your experience? In other words, can the question be settled by argument?

F. 5&6 Hume seems to think that for an art object to be beautiful must please at all times. But do we relate to an art object - music, literature, paintings, the same way throughout our lifetime? And if not, does Hume's argument hold?

G. 1&2 What if two critics disagree on the work? How to settle it?

H. 3&4 Is there an actual standard of beauty? What's the Standard's purpose, anyway?

I. 5&6 Is the argument circular? In other words, you know an object is beautiful b/c the critics agree, and you know to trust the critics agree because they recognize beauty in the objects?
