Sample successful discussion posts:

This supermarket can be viewed as an imitation to the concept of a supermarket. Different from a regular supermarket, everything sold in this supermarket is empty: you can say that the supermarket is only selling their packages or their concepts.

From the view of imitation, this artwork imitates a totally regular Shanghai supermarket, only that it takes out the value of commodities as something to use. Insdead, it only imitates part of a regular supermarket and tries to extract the value of packages and show this value to the audience. Or it may want to arise some critic thinking about what you are buying and why you are buying them.

Additionally, Xu Zhen's Supermarket is open to the public for buying. The customers can buy the goods and even receive a valid receipt. Therefore this supermarket also takes the customers inside and imitates the process of buying and selling. Only this time, what the customers buy and what the supermarket sells is not the consuming value but something more conceptual.

Imitation can be a way of trying to make the perfect copy of a unique concept, as most pieces artwork were using Plato's view of imitation. But Xu Zhen's Supermarket may have shown us that imitation can also be an effort to intentionally leave out something so that other aspects that may not be so obvious to the audience can be observed and thought about.

Personally I think this is art. Using the neo-representation theory, this supermarket tries to comment on the value of a supermarket if it only sells the packages and concepts of everyday products.

Answers the prompt	Shows understanding of theory	Applies theory to the case study	Offers new insights
😀	😀	😃	😁
Quotes or fully describes ‘texts’	Gives evidence for statements	Clarifies the insights	Acknowledges limitations and different possible opinions
😀	😃	😃	🤔

1.I think from Plato's view point,this imatation is a kind of initiative imitation, because unlike the poets and painters, who imitate because their art forms are not able to show the whole appearance of the things, Xuzhen's form is more reductive. It can show the whole appearance, but Xuzhen choose to only show the external packing.

2. By thinking about it in this way, I found that maybe imitation itself can sometimes be a form of neo-representational theory of art because in this work, imitation is a way to express the artist's comments or observation about ths comsumption.
3.For me, this is of course a art because it's the artists unique way of subjective expression. In fact, it's hard for Plato to understand this art because it's completely a product of the modern business system and a reflection on it.When modern people commercialize goods, they make so many things that are separate from the goods themselves. This insight struck me as brilliant

Answers the prompt	Shows understanding of theory	Applies theory to the case study	Offers new insights
😀	😀	😃	😄
Quotes or fully describes ‘texts’	Gives evidence for statements	Clarifies the insights	Acknowledges limitations and different possible opinions
😟	🤔	🤔	🤔

Shown in the picture is part of a stamp album distributed by Taipei Post Office in Taipei, Taiwan. The subjects of these stamps are all among the most reknowned collections of the National Palace Museum, including paintings, potteries, stone carvings and bronzewares. The album was bought during a vacation visit around eight years ago.
Undoubtedly, these stamps are relatively faithful reproductions of the original artworks that are confined to their respective spaces by their uniqueness and fragility. However, there may seem to be little technical difference between stamps and ordinary photographs, as both are merely images printed on the surface of paper. What reactivates and amplifies the meaning of these reproductions, from my view, lies in the cultural and historical value of stamps themselves.
Up till the end of 20th century, stamps had always played a significant role in the wide circulation of mail. The amount of postage officially assigned to them had limited the possibility of their mass production, thus resulting in their greater uniqueness than photographs that display the same objects on their surfaces. Furthermore, in recent decades, as the usage of stamps rapidly decline, new historical values have emerged out of them - people are gradually turning to stamps as a static medium of documenting and displaying ancient artworks and historic events. Therefore, it is reasonable to say that the stamps are indeed meaningful reproductions of the origina

Answers the prompt	Shows understanding of theory	Applies theory to the case study	Offers new insights
😀	😀	😀	😀
Quotes or fully describes ‘texts’	Gives evidence for statements	Clarifies the insights	Acknowledges limitations and different possible opinions
😀	😀	😀	😀

I took a walk around a pond near my apartment in Ann Arbor. There are exuberant trees, verdant lawn, and small yellow flowers by the waterside. I saw some birds, squirrels, and geese wandering around freely and happily. It surprised me to see so many creatures living in the vicinity. When I walked closer to them, they looked at me and ran away. Perhaps they did not realize that there are also some human beings living in their neighborhood.

During the experience, I was both a spectator and an actor of nature. I took a close look at everything in front of me, appreciating their colors, shapes, etc. In the meantime, I became part of nature, and probably animals observed me in the same way. Through interaction with the landscape and animals, I felt the immersive atmosphere of nature, which cannot be offered by landscape paintings or photography. Those paintings and photography works are bounded and framed while nature is unbounded and frameless. The emotions evoked by natural objects depend on participants’ inner mental state instead of being preset as those in the artwork. For instance, I enjoyed listening to birds’ melodious singing and feeling gentle breezes on my face on a pleasant day like today. I got the impression that those animals had a good mood like me. However, when a thunderstorm hit my area and caused a power outage several days ago, I felt anxious looking at the pouring rain and hearing the roar of fierce wind. It was as if nature was having a difficult time and going through something unfortunate. This kind of unconscious process of relating natural elements to human emotions is common among us, which is called humanization of nature in Hepburn’s words.

Answers the prompt	Shows understanding of theory	Applies theory to the case study	Offers new insights
😀	😀	😀	😀
Quotes or fully describes ‘texts’	Gives evidence for statements	Clarifies the insights	Acknowledges limitations and different possible opinions
🙂	😀	😀	🧐

Such kind of 'experiencing nature' actually enhanced my 'feeling' temporarily since there were few things disturbing. During this process, various of 'properties' or 'things' about the nature came to my mind -- my skin sensed wetness and temperature of the air, my eyes recognized the glinting sunlight, and I even 'felt' the thickness and roughness of leaves and grass when I touched them.
This is a sort of experience, as Hepburn said, different from 'know'. I was, actually, 'at the same time the natural environment or some part of it', and this seems to be a kind of 'unity'. For a long time I even regarded the gentle wind and the twittering of birds as a kind of communication between nature and me. I considered this as what Hepburn said -- 'naturizing of the human'. But there was a distance between me and the nature when I jumped out of the pure feelings, trying to savour the nature 'aesthetically' as a human in my mind. A 'reconciliation' was built.

Answers the prompt	Shows understanding of theory	Applies theory to the case study	Offers new insights
😀	😀	😀	😀
Quotes or fully describes ‘texts’	Gives evidence for statements	Clarifies the insights	Acknowledges limitations and different possible opinions
🙂	🙂	🙂🤔	🧐